Did the interference no-call in the Rams/Saints game "rob the Saints of a spot in the Super Bowl", as many are angrily and persistently proclaiming - even including filing a federal lawsuit to replay the end of the game? Perhaps there is a life lesson in all of this. First,

(a) Even if the call had been made, the Saints thus scoring was not a certainty.

(b) A lot of football was played after that no call, and the outcome of the game was not a certainty then either.

Second, how easy and unfortunate it can be to focus on "what might have been" or "what should have been". Although we cannot always control what happens in life, we do control how we respond. Do we look back or look forward? Do we focus on what happened or what we can now make happen? We cannot change what happened, but we can change what happens next.

Following the no-call, perhaps the Saints team got stuck in "what should have been", which may have impacted how they subsequently played. Saints fans, who had a legitimate complaint over the no-call, now seem to be frozen in what they believe "should have" been their victory. What "should have been" can be one of the quickest quagmires in which to get stuck. It becomes a ball and chain that inhibits growth, hobbles happiness, and limits perspective. But Jesus is the chain breaker, the way maker, come to "proclaim release to the captives" (Luke 4:18). "So, if the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed" (John 8:36).

See you in worship!
